The Evening World to-day distributes the $500 in prizes for handwriting which it offered two months ago to the school children of Greater Six Prizes-$2 Each. New York.

It was expected that the awards could be made earlier, but the number of competitors was so great the selections could not be made with more expedition, especially as The Evening World wished to give as much care as possible to picking the winners. It spared no pains in going over the examples of writing submitted, being determined that the most worthy should receive the prizes.

Schools of all denominations are represented in the prize winning of the competitions are represented in the prize winning of the competitions are represented in the prize winning of the competitions are represented in the prize winning of the competitions are represented in the prize winning of the competitions are represented in the prize winning of the competitions are represented in the prize winning of the competitions are represented in the prize winning of the competitions are represented in the prize winning of the competitions are represented in the prize winning of the competitions are represented in the prize winning of the competitions are represented in the prize winning of the competitions are represented in the prize winning of the competition, the competition of the compe ber of competitors was so great the selections could not be made with going over the examples of writing submitted, being determined that the most worthy should receive the prizes. Schools of all denominations are represented in the prize winning lists.

A noteworthy fact in connection with this contest is that the younger children showed up to excellent advantage in the specimens of handwitting which they sent in. Some school children of six and seven years, who are among the youngest winners, wrote like little past masters of the art of penmanship.

The winning list is a long one, but The Evening World could make it much longer if it had room to print the names of the youngaters who figured in the contest with work of such excellent quality that it deserved honorable mention at least.

We must be satisfied, however, with printing the names of those all the thousands who competed, winners and losers as well, a Happy New Yar and the best of good fortune in the future with their brains and pens. It also hopes that everybody will be satisfied.
